新聞內容

JULES JANIN ON THE OPENING OF THE GREAT EXHIBITION.
(From the Journal des Débats.)
I am not called upon this time for fine writing and learned periods gracefully rounded. I must write straight-ahead and lose no time, so that we, the leisurely ornamental writers, are actually dragged in spite of ourselves into this career of steam and coal, and are lugged in tow at the tail of all these things whose rate of travelling is that of the lightning. Vainly would we ask for mercy or favour. Grant me at least one instant that I may arrange in some order all these visions, that I may explain to myself all these phantasms, one minute—only one minute for reflection. Vain efforts—vain prayers—not an instant—not a minute—thou art linked to all these revolving wheels, and thou must turn as they turn, otherwise the wheel will crush you and proceed on its journey.
It is a strange thing is this necessity for such fast going in a place so vast and so calm on the surface. Speed is a disease with which this city of London is infected, and it seizes at once upon the dreamer—on the artist—on the most opposite natures. Race along full speed! and nothing more is required of you. Go ahead; but if you have the misfortune to return on your steps you are lost. The line which you have just written—try and read it again, and it will fly
