For most of the 1990s, I was writing mainly about Donne's love poems, though my "John Donne" essay in The Cambridge Companion to English Poetry, Donne to Marvell took a larger view, embracing his Satires, devotional poems, and Anniversaries, as well as the Elegies and Songs and Sonets.

Returning to John Donne

he raises some particularly intriguing ideas about the relationship between literary texts and future readers.

Jonson's faith in the immortality of verse entails a clear recognition of the importance not just of the poet but of the reader in making that verse immortal. As he claims in his poem "To the Memory of My Beloved, the Author Mr. William Shakespeare,"<sup>5</sup> Shakespeare is ... alive still, while thy Booke doth live,

And we have wits to read, and praise to give. (ll. 23-24)

Shakespeare's book perpetuates his memory, but the book alone is insufficient to ensure his immortality. Unless he has proper readers (like Jonson) who have the wit to understand his work and can praise it, Shakespeare cannot live. Without diminishing his praise of Shakespeare, whose work, Jonson admits, is monumental, Jonson confers a tremendous power on the audience—they share responsibility for a poet's immortality, infusing life into his works which otherwise might die. It is clear here that Jonson recognized that the immortality of poetry depends upon a future audience of readers who appreciate and praise the literary works of the poet, thus keeping them alive.

Of course, Jonson is not the only writer to acknowledge the importance of a future audience in securing immortal fame. Ovid at the end of Metamorphoses proclaims that he will be read through all centuries and that his name will be remembered wherever Roman power spreads. Horace in his Odes also looks towards the future: he will be studied by the Spaniards and those who live on the Rhone, and will be famed by posterity. Even Milton, for all his ambivalence about fame ("the last infirmity of the Noble mind"), recognizes the active role of the future audience when he speaks of his early hope that he "might perhaps leave something so written to aftertimes, as they should not willingly let it die."<sup>6</sup>

We should note, however, that not every writer who hoped for immortality through verse believed posterity's praise was essential. In Herrick the importance of the future audience is much diminished. It is true that Herrick's numerous poems distinguishing ideal readers from mere critics or detractors (for example, H-4, H-5, H-6, H-95) suggest that he shares Jonson's sense of the need for a fit audience, and his poem "To live merrily, and to trust to Good Verses" (H-201) implies that Homer, Virgil, Ovid, Propertius, and Tibullus live on in part because 莎士比亞的書延續了他的記憶，但僅在書不足以保證他不死，除非他有正確的讀者喜歡瓊森誰擁有了智慧，了解他的工作，可以讚美它莎士比亞不能住。
